WORDS OF WISDOM

ATAFOM UNIVERSITY NEWSLETTER

DO NOT LEAVE ANYTHING TO CHANCE – YOU ARE THEN THE WINNER IF YOU HAVE DEFEATED YOURSELF

Dr. Sakir Yavuz
By Comfort Bulus

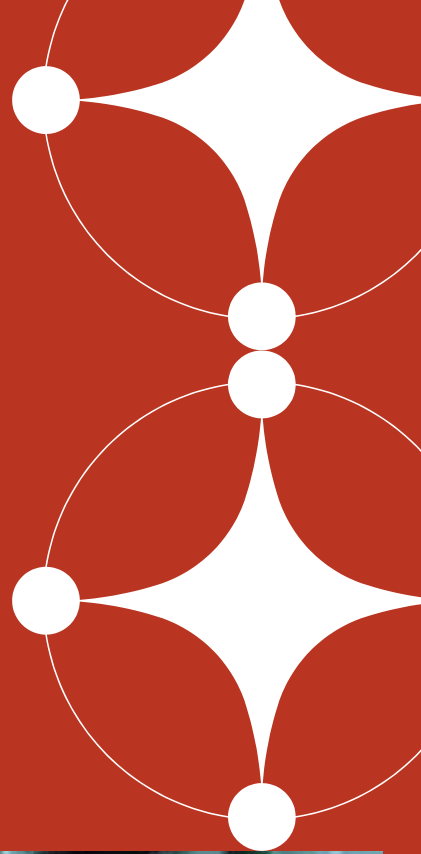

Living is similar to playing chess. You can be checkmated with just one wrong move. Everyone is battling for their lives. Everyone aspires to hold the coveted corner office and to rule as king. However, only a few clever people can escape the landmine and succeed. Becoming king requires a lot of planning, strategy, and work. You must carefully plan and carry out every move you make.

Along with preparation and execution, you will also need to keep getting better. You realise that daily you have new opportunities where you win some, and then you lose some. When you are intentional about opportunities, you tend to grow more than when you accidentally stumble over them. So be intentional. With any luck, a fortunate coincidence will lead you to that individual, that event, or that organisation that needs to hear about or be a part of ATAFOM University International. This ideal opportunity could arise from your posts online, a word, gesture or image presented at the right moment. Be on the lookout for potential problems. Therein could lie the long-awaited opportunity to share the vision and spirit of ATAFOM University. Be expectant of things coming together sometimes without much difficulty, but be prepared to work hard when the need arises. It always pays off.

However, don't assume that people who need the services of ATAFOM University International will easily find you. You must be intentional. Referrals are great, but be responsible for your success. Share the good news far and wide. Success is not achieved by relying on luck. Every lucky event or circumstance should motivate you to seek more opportunities. Refrain from depending on the chance to produce specific outcomes if you truly desire them. You have to go after them. Intentional actions toward your objectives and the desired results will result in success. Success is a scorekeeper; it recognises when you have made an advance payment for what you want.

Therefore, create a pursuit strategy, foster relationships, and follow your dreams. The thing eventually gives when you put enough work and energy into anything for a long enough period. However, you must take significant, targeted action and be intentional if you want to be successful in 2023. In the words of Dr. Sakir Yavuz, "do not leave anything to chance – you are then the winner if you have defeated yourself".

The time is now. BE INTENTIONAL!

A NEW DAY IN THE NEW YEAR AT ATAFOM UNIVERSITY INTERNATIONAL

By Comfort Bulus

Before online learning, obtaining a college degree required physically attending in-person classes, which was frequently difficult for people with demanding schedules or who were in the workforce. Finding a degree program that gives the flexibility you require is now simpler than ever thanks to technological advancements, whether through conventional in-person classes, online learning, or a combination of the two. Online courses provide several benefits, including the freedom to learn whenever, wherever, and however suits you best. This makes it simpler to get a degree while juggling work and family obligations. Online learning also gives you access to top degree programs offered throughout the nation that might otherwise be unavailable or very inconvenient without requiring you to attend classes in person. But if you're unprepared, taking online classes might be very difficult. The courses, however, can be a great substitute for traditional classroom instruction if you understand how to learn online effectively.

At ATAFOM University International, we welcome all our returning and new students to a new academic year in October 2022.

We are aware of the trepidations some might have to start an online program and we are more than willing to walk through each challenge, question or situation with each of our students to help you attend your desired success. We offer a little advice for all our students and interested readers on how you can address unique challenges to get the most value out of your online program.

Treat your online courses the same as you would a traditional / conventional one.

You must have the self-control to sit down and declare, "I am going to work on this", as well as the commitment to carry out your plans when taking online classes. While you can select anytime during the week to finish your task, you cannot put it off indefinitely. Remembering that you are paying for this online course in the same way that you would for a conventional, in-person class is one of the simplest strategies to assure follow-through. For your lesson to be truly beneficial, you must "show up" and do it regularly! Treat your online courses as you would a face-to-face course, or even better, a career, and be diligent.

Recognize your responsibility.

At the start of the semester, make goals and check in with yourself every week. In a conventional classroom situation, you'll frequently get verbal or visual cues that an assignment's due date is approaching. But it's your responsibility to make sure you've allocated enough time to complete the task since your professor won't aggressively remind you to do so. That way, you won't start an assignment the day before it's due. Pair up with a classmate or acquaintance to check in as an accountability partner if you are having problems being accountable to yourself. Even when life outside of school becomes stressful, you may benefit the most from your online course by being prepared, proactive, and self-aware.

Manage your time well.

One of the most alluring aspects of online learning is frequently the freedom to design your timetable. However, if you do not possess strong time management abilities, that freedom could also be harmful. Without them, you can find yourself scrambling before classes or turning in shoddy work. The way you manage your time can vary depending on your schedule, the preferred method of learning, and your personality, however, the following advice will help you practice and advance your time management abilities:

- a. At the beginning of the semester, review the syllabus and make a note of any important assignments. Put them on a calendar that you frequently check to see what work is coming up in the upcoming weeks. Don't forget to account for events like weddings and vacations that can conflict with your usual study plan so you can give yourself enough extra time to finish homework.
- b. Establish a weekly routine that you adhere to, setting aside specific times each week for reading, viewing lectures, finishing projects, studying, and taking part in forums. Set reminders for yourself to finish your online coursework, and commit to incorporating it into your weekly schedule.
- c. Try time-blocking when working on your assignments by giving each task a specific amount of time before moving on to the next one and setting a timer to keep you on track.
- d. Throughout the term, check in occasionally and consider your time management. How much time am I allotting to reading for classes and completing assignments? Do I frequently underestimate how long it takes me to complete tasks, making me cram the nights before exams? A little introspection and modification can help a lot.

Establish a regular study area and stay organized.

Create a space just for learning where you may do your studying. You'll start to develop a routine if you finish your job there repeatedly. It's crucial to ascertain what kind of atmosphere would perform best for you whether your workstation is your kitchen table, a library, or a corner seat in a neighborhood coffee shop. Try different settings to see which one increases productivity. Make sure there is high-speed internet access wherever you decide to go so you aren't trying to take an online course over a slow connection. You may keep organized by setting up a regular desk or office. You can stay on track to accomplish your goals by knowing exactly where essential dates, documents, forms; syllabuses, books, and assignments are located. When organizing your study area, be sure to:

- possess a fast internet connection
- possess the course's necessary readings, resources, and software
- when listening to lectures or conversations, wear headphones (especially important in shared spaces)

Avoid being distracted.

You'll encounter a variety of distractions, such as various ads on the internet, movies, music videos, social media, and the dishes stacking up in the sink, which can easily prevent you from completing your studies. The most successful online learners understand how to reduce these interruptions and schedule focused time.

Depending on your particular personality and circumstance, these distractions may or may not be challenging. Some people might discover that turning on music helps them drown out a noisy house. Others might decide to avoid the temptation to multitask at home by working from a nearby coffee shop or library. In the end, you'll need to settle on a plan that works best for you. Wherever you decide to work, think about putting your phone away to prevent being distracted every time a text or notice comes in. Try downloading a website blocker if you're still having difficulties resisting the urge to check your email or browse the internet.

Assess your preferred learning style.

Consider when and how you perform your best job after deciding where you will learn. If you like the mornings, schedule some time to study right away. Perhaps after supper, set aside an hour or two to relax in front of your computer. If the parents or brothers and / or sisters, or kids, or friends need your attention in the morning and at night, try to schedule a study session during the middle of the day while they are in class or elsewhere. Make your customary cup of coffee, tee or your favorite drink, turn on your go-to playlist, and take any other necessary steps to enter the zone so you get to work.

Participate actively.

Use the course's online forum to interact with other students and participate in discussions about the course material. This can entail asking a question about a project you're working on or putting a comment on a discussion board about a paper written by a classmate. If you have a query, seek clarification by reading what other students and your professor are saying. As often as you can, make sure you are also checking in. Because online learning is flexible, you could fit in a discussion response if you have 30 minutes to spare before dinner arrangements. Make it a point to check in on the discussion threads for the class each day.

Utilize your network.

You might occasionally believe that you are studying on your own through online classes, but this couldn't be further from the truth. The majority of online courses are designed with collaboration in mind, and professors and lecturers actively promote it as a way for students to complete tasks and debate material. Introduce yourself to other students and participate in online discussion boards to develop connections. When studying for examinations or seeking feedback on tasks, your peers can be an invaluable resource. You shouldn't be reluctant to contact them to start a virtual study group. The likelihood is high that they will value it equally with you.

The saying "practice makes perfect" should encourage you daily to keep at your selected course/goal. So put this up in your reading space to remind you that a wise man once said "Rome wasn't built in a day." Therefore:

A day, in itself, cannot accomplish anything significant.

Great things in life don't happen overnight.

Consistent hard work is required to achieve good results.

Success comes from perseverance and hard work.

Patience is also a requirement.

Success includes failures.

We ought to be prepared to deal with these shortcomings.

We must not give up and never lose hope.

Making our dreams come true requires patience.

If you work a lot, you make a lot of mistakes!
